not suspected of being rich ale was a timid, fussy little man, who was extremely correct in his notions, and prided himself above everything on being a law abiding citizen.

Mr. Pettigrew passed the greater pure of his time at the club, whereby he had the satisfaction of feeling that he obtained full yalue for the amount of his arnual subscription. Among his club acquaintax cess was a certain Captain Falconer, with when he had been for some years on frierdly terms. For a long time Mr. Pettigrew has generally regarded as rather a mysterious personage. Nobody knew how he compensor, with when he height of fashion, to live in sumption on the business he introduced to a well-known West-End money lender, and is secretain abtenced a handsone commission on the business he introduced to a well-known West-End money lender, and is secretain abtenced the captain obtained a handsone commission on the business he introduced to a well-known West-End money lender, and is secretain falconer derived any benefit from these acts of good nature. He was a jovial, houd-voiced, righticking, boisterous persona, who was shall-fellow-well-met when the companies of the state of many though the reversibility of the secretain that he could always be relied upon the business he introduced to a well-known West-End money lender, and is secretain falconer derived any benefit from these acts of good nature. He was a jovial, houd-voiced, righticking, boisterous person, who was shall-fellow-well-met with the very one, and possessed the happy kneck of the falconer derived any benefit to every kind of society.

Mr. Pettigrew, whose wordly experience was strictly limited had only mistrusted the Captain because he seemed the sort of man wito would-borrow twenty pounds without the slightest [comp quartion. He never, Indeed, altogether conquerted this missiving, but in course of Alme—as Captain on the probability, but in course of the mean of the second the probability, but in course of the captain of the probability, but in course of the captain of the

It was a peculiarity of the Captain's that he was always able to testow favors of this kind. Mr. Pettigrew was by no means a recluse, and to go any where or see anything for nothing add real zest to his enjoyment. He therefore accepted these little tokens of friendsh p from the Captain in a grateful and appresitative spirit, the more particularly as that the Captain real had a regard for him. This dea, whethy correct or not, was certainly excusably seeing that Mr. Pettigrew had never offered to nage the slightest, return for sorvices rendered in any shape or form It chanced at length that Mr. Pettigrew had occasion to take a journey to the west of England, owing to the serious illness of a rich annut, from whom he herished divectories to procure a free pass for an appropriation. He had known Captain Falconer to procure a free pass for an appropriation of the Captain, whose good nature seemed inexhaustible, readily acceded to his request, so far at least as might lay in his power. He explained that it was not always easy to obtain a free pass on the industry of the construction of the most capable and requestion, but promised to use his influence, and seemed hopeful of the results of the construction of the construction of parents of the construction of the con pocket," he added, rither mysteriously, "Th! ta! old fellow. Sorry I can't vait to see you off."

Mr. Pettigrew wrung his friend's hand and took quite an affectionate farewell of him. The pass was raily a substantial favor, for the first-class fare to Plymouth and backs foe Mr. Pettigrew, like many other mean geople, never stained himself of hixory and confort at a pinch—amountied to a very considerable number of shiftings. He scated himself will great a adrity in a vacant first-class compartment, called for a foot-warmer, wrapped himself will be to a very considerable purpose. He was beginning rug, and prepared for a comfortable journey.

He was beginning to believe he won d have the compartment to himself, who has before booked in at the window and passed on, how presented himself again, and tool pussession of the corner seat by the door As he did so, the ticket collector appear ad and Mr. Pettigrew presented his pass to inspection.

and Mr. Pettigrew presented his pass to inspection.
It struck Mr. Pettigrew that the official scrutinized the pass somewhat suspice as ly, and, upon returning it, looked at him with a very searching glunce. It is probable that the man merely desired to assure himself of the validity of the document and of the respectability of the holder. On both three points he was no doubt satisfied, for he pussed on without comment but Mr. Pettigrew was of a nervous and lidgety disposition, and he suddenly recalled to mind his friend's somewhat pressing injunction to blin on the platform he put the pass in his pocket. Without suspecting anything wrong, but with vague

FIVE CLURSE. INNER, put the pass in his pocket. Without suspecting anything wrong, but with vague misgivings, he now looked at the pass in his pocket. Without suspecting anything wrong, but with vague misgivings, he now looked at the pass limuself for the first time. It was any are ently perfectly regular, but he perceived with uneasiness that it was made out in favor of a Mr. Moss Levi. The letterpress stated that the reason of the pass being granted should be mentioned in the space indicated for the purpose, and this was finded in by the word "shipping."

Mr. Pottigrew did not at all like the idea of personating somebody class, especially when he proceeded to read the very stringent regulations under which the pass had been obtained, and was only twallabe for the indiv dum in whose name it was made out, was repeated over and over again with painful persistency. Mr. Pettigrew now understood clearly enough why the Capitals had multilested uneasiness. Evidently the pass had been obtained, how rendering hiuself a perty to the fraud.

Mr. Petigrew had one of those excessively tender cor sciences which are indicative of innate cowardies. He was not the least concerned, un moral grounds, how the pass had been obtained, nor would be have felt any siruple about using it if the could have felt any siruple about using it if the feat of the could have felt any siruple about using it if the could have felt carin of not being found out. But he was appalled at the prospect of detection, at the danger secured to his excited imagin thou, imminent. The probability was that this Mr. Moss Levi, being anterest, who had already inspected the pass now seemed to him to have been unpleasantly suggestive of suspicion. It was possible that this man had actually telegraphed down the line to some of this probage in belais on the route to look obtained, nor belais on the route to look obtained, when we were any miles Mn. Pettigrew had almost convinced himself that his worst apprehensions would be realized.

Scarcely less disconnerting tha himself that his worst apprehensions would be realized.

Scarcely less disconcerting than the fear joil detection was the idea of having to keep up the character of the person he was supposed to be. A fatal drawback to this was hat whereas the name of Mr. Moss Lev unmistakably indicated Hebric origin, Mr. Pettigrew's nose was a pure Gentile snub. This was so manifest at a glance that the fact was alone calculated to excite suspicion of his identity. Mr. Pettigrew felt that he could not stand against this insurmountable discrepancy, and khat to attempt to swagger and brazen out the situation—If his identity were challenged—would be hollow mockery. The consequence was that by the time the train reached the first station at which a stoppage occurred, he had digested himself into such a state of abject apprehension that his nervous and agitated manner was almost sufficient to bearay him. When the cleket inspector made his appearance, Mr. Pettigrew, who had wrapped his offending nose in a muffler and turned up the collar of his coat so as to conceal his features as much as possible, handed up his collar of his coat so as to conceal his features as much as possible, handed up his pass with the air of a cr minal. No wonder the official, after looking at it, favored the poor gentleman with a long stare, which made him burst into a colinger, returned the pass without raising any objection, to Mr. Pettigrew's unspeakabla relicf. As the train proceeded on its jour-ncy he breathed more freely, and even for a moment contemplated the possibility of reaching his destination without misad-venture.

Mr. Adolphus Pettigrew was an elderly bachelor of a thrifty turn of mind. He was very comfortably off indeed, but he never spent a shilling when a sixpence would do, and he acted on the principle that charity, in a peculiary serse, begins—and ends—at home. But his meanhoes was not conspicuous, for he was always affable and obliging when it cost him nothing, and he lived so quietly that he was a ways affable and obliging when it cost him nothing and he lived so quietly that he was a ways affable and obliging when it cost him nothing and he lived so quietly that he was a ways affable and obliging when it cost him nothing and he lived so quietly that he was a ways affable and obliging when it cost him nothing and he lived so quietly that he was a ways affable and obliging or heing a liw-abiding citizen.

Mr. Pettigrew passed the greater part of his time at the club, whereby he had the satisfaction of feeling that he obtained full value for the amount of his ar mual subscription. Among his club acquininate ces was a certain Captain Falconer, with whom he field been for some years on fifted dyrams. For a long time Mr. Pettigrew and beautiful proceeded on its journey he bleed more freely, and even for endown the process was not conspicuous. He was a ways and eventure.

forencon one of the sailors on board the schooner Anna Shephard which was about to leave port, skipped away from the vessel after having stolen a pair of boots and an overcoal belonging to the Captain. The latter in a few hours discovered his absence and came up town and informed the police, Returning to his vessel he was surprised to meet the fellow who coolly said that he had decided not to make the trip aboard the vessel and wanted his pay. He had been engaged in Boston to make the trip to Bangor and return for a round sum and so the captain told him that he had no money for him and furthermore he wanted the stolen goods returned. The stilor protested that he had stolen nothing and upon going below the captain found that they had been returned the man evidently thinking that he could make more money out of his "pay" scheme. But it did not work,

A RACE ON THE RAILS. Locomotive and Thirty Freight (are Run from the Odlin Road Through the City at a Terrific Rate. The freight train into Bangor from the west in the early hours of Thursday moraing was made up of forty-six curs and n near the Odlin road the coupling between the engine and the first car back broke. On all roads where these accidents occur, and they are unavoidable, engineers have orders not to let the ears run into the locomotive to stop them, but the brakes or the saloon car are expected to accomplish this purpose. Where the accident took place is at the head of the long grade running into Baugor and the engineer, Fred Sturtevant, immediately ran ahead to keep out of the way of 'the cars, expecting that they would soon be brought to a stand-

But unfortunately, when the saloon broke thirty cars back leaving sixteen cars which could be checked, while the thers commenced to run at great speed. for a few seconds, even though it was very dark, the engineer saw them coming after him and then a race commenced. Hel expected that there would be a sufficient space between his engine and the cars to allow them to be switched on to a side Woodbury in the organization of Can by track when the yard limits were reached caluis No. 17, of the Patriarcha Milli at High Head!
